SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION:*Background

As housing prices throughout the United States have soared in recent years, a variety of alternative mortgage products have grown increasingly prevalent in the mortgage marketplace. Among the most significant products are "interest-only" loans and payment option adjustable rate mortgage (ARM) loans (or "pick-a-payment" loans). The proportion of new mortgages consisting of interest-only and pick-a-payment loans rose dramatically over the last few years. In 2000, such loans made up less than one percent of the home mortgage market. By 2005, they reportedly comprised as much as fifty percent of all new mortgage loans.

These mortgage products may provide benefits for many consumers. Consumers may gain the ability to purchase homes at prices they could not afford using traditional thirty-year, fixed rate mortgages, because the minimum monthly payments required during the initial periods of these loan products are much lower. Moreover, these mortgage products may be especially well suited for certain consumers, such as those with an uneven pattern of income or those anticipating a rise in income.

These mortgage products may also present unexpected risks for consumers. Consumers may not adequately understand that such mortgages could result in "payment shock," when minimum monthly payment amounts jump by as much as 100% upon expiration of a loan's initial period. They also may not understand that some of these loans may yield negative amortization, i.e., a rise in the loan balance because mortgage payments are less than the interest due. Additionally, because these products permit borrowers to defer repayment of principal, borrowers build no equity except to the extent that their homes appreciate in value. Therefore, such loans may be particularly risky in the face of changing market conditions.

Workshop Goals

The workshop will focus on the consumer protection issues that arise in connection with the prevalence of nontraditional mortgage products. Specifically, the FTC will explore various aspects of the current residential mortgage marketplace, including how these mortgage products have evolved, the benefits and risks they pose for consumers, how market forces shape the prevalence of particular mortgage products, and current consumer understanding of the terms, features, risks, and benefits of these loans.

Among the many issues the workshop may address are:

- What are the mortgage product alternatives offered today? Who are the typical borrowers for each product type? What are the trends in this new marketplace?

- What are the benefits and risks to consumers of products such as interest-only and pick-a-payment loans? Are consumers aware of the risks and benefits?

- To what extent are such loans marketed or made to low-income consumers or consumers with low credit scores? Do loans made to such consumers differ in important ways from those made to consumers with higher incomes or better credit scores?

- Why have these products become so prevalent in recent years? What are the roles of lenders, brokers, government-sponsored entities, and secondary market investors in determining which loan products are offered?

- How well does the current regulatory framework address these loan products?

- How well do consumers understand the terms and features of these loans? What do they understand about the risks, such as payment shock or negative amortization?

- How significant is the issue of payment shock? How will it affect the marketplace in the coming years?

- How can consumers who hold these loans best prepare for, or avoid, payment shock?

- How can lenders, loan holders, servicers, or others participate in planning and developing solutions for the consumers who now hold these loans?

- What are best practices for consumers, lenders, and other participants in the loan marketplace?

- What is the FTC's role in protecting consumers in this new mortgage marketplace?
